The worker initiated the request for a determination of his work status as a general laborer and doing personal yard care in tax year 2014. The worker was issued Form 1099-MISC to report his earnings. The firm's business is described as home construction.

The firm's response was signed by the firm's president. The firm's business is described as general contractor. The worker performed services as a laborer.

According to the firm, there was no training given to the worker; he was provided instruction as to job site location and to do cleanup. The assignments were given via phone. The worker determined the methods by which to perform the services. There were no reports required of the worker. The worker's were flexible; the firm indicated in a telephone call that the worker was working as a laborer for a mason and was looking to earn more money. The services were rendered at the customer's location. The worker was not required to perform the services personally.

The worker acknowledged that instructions came from firm; job assignments were given over the phone, in person, or a list. The firm determined the methods by which the worker's services were performed. Any problems or complaints encountered by the worker were directed to the firm for resolution. The worker stated he was required to provide a time card. Services were rendered at the employer's home, customer location, and firm-provided facilities. The worker indicated he was required to perform the services personally; any additional personnel were hired and paid by the firm.

The firm responded that an on-site dumpster was provided with the worker providing the broom and shovel and his transportation. The firm clarified that the worker was paid an hourly wage. The customers paid the firm. Both parties concurred that the worker was not at risk for a financial loss in this work relationship.

The worker replied that the firm provided basic home construction tools, lawn tractor, weed eater, garden tools, pool cleaning equipment. The worker furnished his vehicle and did not incur any other expenses in the performance of the job. The firm paid him an hourly wage; the customer paid the firm.

Both parties concur that no benefits were extended to the worker and that either party could terminate the work relationship without incurring a liability or penalty.

Analysis

A worker who is required to comply with another person's instructions about when, where, and how he or she is to work is ordinarily an employee. This control factor is present if the person or persons for whom the services are performed have the right to require compliance with instructions. Some employees may work without receiving instructions because they are highly proficient and conscientious workers or because the duties are so simple or familiar to them. Furthermore, the instructions, that show how to reach the desired results, may have been oral and given only once at the beginning of the relationship.

Payment by the hour, week, or month generally points to an employer-employee relationship, provided that this method of payment is not just a convenient way of paying a lump sum agreed upon as the cost of a job. In such instances, the firm assumes the hazard that the services of the worker will be proportionate to the regular payments. This action warrants the assumption that, to protect its investment, the firm has the right to direct and control the performance of the workers. Also, workers are assumed to be employees if they are guaranteed a minimum salary or are given a drawing account of a specified amount that need not be repaid when it exceeds earnings.

A person who can realize a profit or suffer a loss as a result of his or her services is generally an independent contractor, while the person who cannot is an employee. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The risk that a worker will not receive payment for his or her services, however, is common to both independent contractors and employees and, thus, does not constitute a sufficient economic risk to support treatment as an independent contractor. If a worker loses payment from the firm's customer for poor work, the firm shares the risk of such loss. Control of the firm over the worker would be necessary in order to reduce the risk of financial loss to the firm. The opportunity for higher earnings or of gain or loss from a commission arrangement is not considered profit or loss.

We have considered the information provided by both parties and have applied the above law to this work relationship. In this case, the firm retained the right to change the worker's methods and to direct the worker to the extent necessary to protect its financial investment and business reputation and to ensure its customers' satisfaction and that its contractual obligations were met. The worker was not operating a separate and distinct business; the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided. Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the firm's business.

CONCLUSION

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.
